Robert Harms : Games against Nature: An Eco-Cultural History of the Nunu of Equatorial Africa (Studies in Environment and History) before purchasing it in order to gauge whether or not it would be worth my time, and all praised Games against Nature: An Eco-Cultural History of the Nunu of Equatorial Africa (Studies in Environment and History):

In this book, Robert Harms makes an important advance toward recovering the history of the people of the rain forest by telling the story of the Nunu, who live in and around swampy floodplains of the middle Zaire River. Using concepts drawn from game theory, Professor Harms explores the changing relationship between nature and culture among the Nunu. Picturing Nunu society as animated by a never-ending competition among lineages and households, he traces how the competition pushed people into new environments, and how adaptation to the new environment, in turn, led to new forms of competition.
